

God wants to tell you something right now 5/2/25

God is speaking to you right now, are you ready to listen and let His words transform your life?

Have you ever felt like God is trying to speak to you but you just can't hear him? Maybe you've been waiting for a word, a sign, a direction and yet everything seems quiet.

What if I told you that God is speaking right now in this moment and that He has something powerful to say that could change your life forever. It's not just about hearing words, it's about listening with a heart ready to be transformed.

Today we're going to dive deep into the Truth that God's voice is always present, always timely and always leading us to a life of greater purpose, but here's the challenge. We must choose to listen. In this video you'll discover how His voice defies the noise of the world, calls us into deeper trust and invites us to surrender in ways that lead to true transformation.

Stay with me until the end, because what you hear today has the potential to unlock something extraordinary in your life. You won't want to miss this. Many of us imagine that when God speaks, it must be in grand earth shattering ways, thunder cracking from the heavens, a burning bush ablaze in the wilderness, or the voice of an angel breaking into the silence of night.

We expect the extraordinary, the dramatic, the undeniable, yet the Truth woven through Scripture and through lives of all who have truly walked with God is far different. God speaks most often, not through earthquakes or storms, but through the quiet thread of everyday moments.

He speaks in the gentle pull of conscience when temptation lures us off the path. He speaks in the beauty of a sunrise that softens a hardened heart. He speaks in the wisdom of a friend who says exactly what we needed to hear but did not know how to ask.

He speaks in Scripture, alive and piercing, when a single verse seems to leap off the page and hold our soul captive. God's voice does not always arrive with a trumpet blast. Sometimes it comes like a whisper carried by the morning breeze.

The sacred is not set apart from the common, the divine often wraps itself in the ordinary. Jesus himself, God in the flesh, chose to walk among fishermen, tax collectors and sinners weaving the infinite into the fabric of daily life.

He told stories about seeds, vineyards, lost coins and wayward sons. If we look closely we will find that God's messages to us are similarly tucked into the folds of our own lives, the conversation with a child who trusts us unconditionally, the unexpected act of kindness from a stranger, the ache of longing when we realize the world cannot satisfy us, these are all moments where eternity brushes against time.

It is not that God is silent, it is that we often fail to recognize His voice because we are listening for the wrong kind of sound, our ears are tuned to the dramatic, our hearts are conditioned for the sensational, yet God's preferred language is often the language of the heart.

He speaks to us in love, in correction, in invitation, in warning, in the subtle urgings that we are freed to heed or to ignore. His speaking respects our freedom yet His patience endures, always seeking, always calling, always waiting.

When we approach life with an expectancy that God is present and speaking, the world around us changes. No longer are we merely rushing from task to task, we are walking through a living speaking creation where every moment carries the potential for divine encounter.

The meal around the family table becomes a sacrament. The long weary day becomes a canvas upon which God paints perseverance and unseen Grace, even in suffering. His voice echoes, sometimes not with explanations but with a deeper, quieter assurance of His presence and His promise.

To listen for God's voice through every moment is to live awake, alive, attentive, it is to believe that Heaven is not far off beyond the clouds but pressing close against the thin veil of this world, whispering to those who have ears to hear.

It is to understand that every breath is a gift, every conversation an opportunity, every hardship a forge, every joy a glimpse of the joy that will one day be ours in full.

God is not waiting for special occasions to speak to you, He is speaking now in this very moment, weaving His message into the tapestry of your life, if only you would slow down, be still and listen.

There is a deep irony in the human soul, we long to hear the voice of God and yet we fill our lives with so much noise that His voice is drowned out. It is not that God has forgotten to speak, it is that we have forgotten how to listen.

We race through our days, consumed by the endless clamor of responsibilities, entertainment, anxieties and ambition. We live in a world where silence is an unwelcome stranger, where stillness feels unnatural and where every spare moment is filled with screens, voices, demands and noise and it is this very noise that becomes the great barrier between our hearts and the voice of our Maker.

God in His mercy refuses to compete with the chaos. He does not shout to be heard over the din of our distractions. He waits for the soul that is willing to step away from the carnival of the world and seek Him in the quiet.

Scripture reveals this mystery over and over. When Elijah stood trembling in the cave, He did not find God in the roaring wind, nor in the earthquake, nor in the blazing fire. God came in a still small voice, the lesson was not about volume but about posture.

Only a heart that is quiet and humble can hear the voice of God. Pride is noise, worry is noise, restlessness is noise, they create a static in the soul that blocks the frequency of heaven.

When we are obsessed with our own plans, fears and desires, our ears grow deaf to the whisper of divine wisdom. The Lord speaks peace but how can peace enter a heart that is already filled with clamor?

The Lord speaks truth but how can truth penetrate a mind that is already occupied with a thousand conflicting opinions? The Lord speaks love but how can love take root in soil that has been hardened by hurry and ambition?

To hear God clearly there must be a great emptying. A willing surrender of the noise we have grown so accustomed to, a radical decision to create space for the sacred in a world that demands we fill every second.

Prayer must become not just a list of petitions but a place of listening. Scripture must become not just a duty but a meeting ground where the living word speaks into our lives. Silence must be reclaimed not as empty. It is a hard thing to lay down the noise.

It requires courage to be still, for in stillness we are confronted with the deepest truths about our ourselves and about God.

We discover how much we have depended on the noise to numb us, to distract us, to shield us from the quiet demands of the spirit, yet when we dare to set it all aside, when we dare to be still and small before the Eternal One, we find that His voice is not far off at all.

It has been speaking all along, waiting patiently, offering life and wisdom and love that no noise could ever imitate or replace.

The greatest barrier is not God's distance, it is our own unwillingness to be quiet enough to hear. There is a divine precision to the way God speaks. A timeliness that does not bend to human impatience or hurry but is always perfectly fitted to the needs to the soul.

We often mistake God's silence for absence but the Truth is that God is never late nor is He ever early. His voice comes exactly at the moment it is needed, even when we cannot perceive it, with the urgency of our restless hearts, His timing is not measured by clocks or calendars but by the deep rhythms of Grace that govern the unseen workings of our lives.

When we are pressed under the weight of waiting, when our prayers seem to rise to heaven unanswered, the temptation is to believe that God has forgotten us yet Scripture tells a different story.

Joseph languished in prison for years before the Word of the Lord tested him and released him into his destiny. Abraham waited decades for the promised son all while growing old in a land he did not own.

Even the Lord Jesus himself, the word made flesh, entered the world in what seemed the fullness of human delay. Born into a weary world aching for deliverance, God's word came not when it was convenient but when it was perfect.

Our anxiety craves immediacy but God's love aims for maturity. If He spoke too soon we would not be ready to receive what He is saying. If He answered before the soil of our hearts had been tilled by hardship and hope, we would trample the seat of His word under foot.

God speaks when the soul is most ripe for transformation. When the lesson will not merely be heard but embraced, when obedience will not be reluctant but joyful. His voice comes with authority but it also comes with tender understanding of where we are and what we are capable of bearing.

Sometimes the very silence we fear is the preparation for the word we most need. In the stillness, God shapes our desires, purifies our motives and strengthens our faith, then in a moment we did not orchestrate, His voice breaks in and we know beyond doubt that He has been working all along.

His timing reveals His sovereignty, His word reveals His heart. When God's message comes, it often re-frames the entire story we thought we understood. What seemed like delay reveals itself to have been Protection.

What felt like abandonment was actually the hidden hand of Providence, what looked like confusion becomes the path to clarity. There is no such thing as wasted waiting with God.

Every moment, every tear, every longing is gathered into the tapestry of His perfect plan. We do not command the voice of God, we receive it. We do not schedule His speaking. We prepare ourselves to listen, whenever and however He chooses to speak, Trusting God's timing is a fierce and beautiful surrender. A declaration that He is good not only in His words but in the moment He chooses to speak them.

His word will come and when it does, it will be exactly what our soul needs, no sooner, no later, but precisely on time according to the wisdom of eternity.

When God speaks, His words are never meant to leave us unchanged, His voice does not merely comfort the wounded or sooth the restless, it calls the sinner to repentance, the complacent to courage, the proud to humility and the broken to wholeness.

Whenever God addresses His people, it is with a burning intention to reshape them into the likeness of His Son, to peel away the layers of falsehood and self deception and to draw them into the full radiant life for which they were created.

His voice, though gentle is never passive, it disrupts, it confronts, it awakens. We are often tempted to seek a God who will bless our plans, affirm our feelings and endorse the life we have chosen for ourselves, but the God of Scripture is far more loving and therefore far more dangerous to our illusions.

When He speaks, He aims not to prop up our kingdoms but to invite us into His. To hear His voice is to be summoned away from the shallow waters of self centered living into the deep currents of divine purpose. His words have weight, they are not suggestions for a better life but commands for a new one.

Transformation is not optional for those who listen. When Moses encountered the voice of God from the burning bush, he could not return to tending sheep as though nothing had happened. When Isaiah heard the voice of the Lord in the temple, he was undone, convicted of his sin, commissioned to a prophetic life he had not chosen.

When the disciples heard the call of Christ, they dropped their nets, left their former lives and followed Him into the unknown. In every case, the voice of God marked the end of one life and the beginning of another.

Yet the transformation God calls us to is not driven by guilt or fear but by love. He does not call us to change because we are worthless but because we are precious. He sees in us the reflection of His image, marred by sin, hidden by shame and covered by pride.

His voice speaks to that deeper self, calling forth the true identity He has woven into our souls from the beginning. He calls us to become not less ourselves but more truly who we were always meant to be in Christ.

Hearing God's voice means stepping into a lifelong process of being shaped, pruned, refined. It means accepting seasons of discomfort and surrender, trusting that the Potter knows what the clay was made to become.

It means laying down the easy idols of safety and reputation for the harder brighter glory of holiness. It means allowing His word to cut through the hardened layers of our heart, to wound if necessary in order to heal what we have broken and what the world has scarred.

The voice of God is not an accessory to an already busy life, it is a summons to a new life altogether. Those who hear it and obey will find that though the path is narrow and sometimes steep, it is lined with Grace at every step.

To be transformed by His voice is to become fully alive, fully free and fully His, not only in theory but in the lived reality of every thought, every choice, every breath. To truly hear the voice of God, we must first recognize that listening to Him is not merely a passive act but an active surrender.

It is not enough to simply hear His words, we must trust that what He speaks is the most vital thing for us and we must surrender our will, our understanding and our desires to the truth He brings.

Trust and surrender are the foundations upon which a life of genuine listening is built, without them we remain deaf to His voice, no matter how clearly He speaks.

The act of listening to God requires more than just attentiveness, it requires the willingness to follow where His words lead. There is a profound humility in true listening, a humility that accepts that we are not in control.

Our natural inclination is to listen only to those words we agree with or whose voices align with our own will, but the voice of God is not always aligned with our desires or understanding. His wisdom often challenges the narrow confines of our human perspectives.

He does not speak to affirm our plans but to call us to something higher, something greater than we could ever envision on our own.

Listening to God then means entrusting our will to His perfect wisdom, trusting that His ways are higher than ours and that His plan is far better than anything we could design for ourselves.

Surrendering our will to God's voice is not always an easy thing, it requires that we let go of our desire for control, our attachment to comfort and our fear of the unknown. We fear that if we truly listen, God will ask something of us that we are not ready to give and yet with every encounter with God's voice, we find that He does not take from us to harm us but to bless us.

His commands are not burdens but invitations to freedom, in surrendering to His voice, we enter into a life where the weight of self reliance is lifted and the peace of His sovereignty reigns. Trust is the key that unlocks the door of surrender.

To trust God's voice is to believe that He is good, that He loves us and that He knows what is best for us. Trust enables us to step forward in faith, even when we cannot see the whole path. It gives us the courage to obey even when obedience feels like a leap into the unknown.

Trust says I do not know what tomorrow holds but I know You, O Lord, hold tomorrow in Your Hands. Listening to God is not just about receiving His words in our hearts, it is about putting them into action.

True listening leads to obedience. When we trust God enough to follow where He leads, we find that His voice is not a burden but a light guiding us through the darkest moments of our lives. His call to surrender is not one that strips us of our identity, rather it is the call to discover our truest identity in Him.

In surrender, we find freedom and in trust we find the courage to walk where He leads knowing that His voice will never lead us astray. Listening requires that we are willing to surrender the illusion of control and trust that in doing so, we will discover a deeper and more abundant life than we could ever achieve on our own.

As we learn to trust God's voice, our hearts become more attuned to the sound of His calling and our lives began to reflect the beauty of His perfect plan. When God speaks, His words often challenge the very foundations of human wisdom.

In a world that prizes intellect, strategy and self sufficiency, the voice of God is frequently a call to act in ways that seem illogical, counterintuitive or even foolish to the world.

This is the scandal of the gospel and the mystery of divine wisdom, that God's ways are so far beyond our own understanding that they often appear nonsensical to the natural mind, yet it is precisely in the Defiance of human wisdom that the power of God is revealed.

Consider the stories in Scripture where God calls His people that make no sense by earthly standards.

He told Noah to build an Ark when there was no rain, no sign of flood and no explanation of how such a disaster could even be possible. He commanded Abraham to leave his home and family and go to a land he had never seen without telling him where it was.

He instructed Moses to strike a rock in the wilderness for water and He told Joshua to march around the walls of Jericho in silence for days before they would fall. To human eyes these commands seem absurd, they defy reason, they stretch the limits of logic and they contradict any sensible plan but God's wisdom is not bound by the limitations of human understanding.

His thoughts are not our thoughts and His ways are not our ways, what He speaks and commands is not meant to conform to the logic of this world, it is meant to reveal the depth of His Sovereignty and the power of His eternal purpose.

What appears to be a foolish instruction is, in fact, a means to bringing glory to God and demonstrating that He alone is the source of true wisdom. When God calls us to step out in obedience, it often requires a surrender of our own calculations and assessments.

We must let go of the need to understand everything before we act and instead trust that His Wisdom is greater than anything we could devise on our own. To listen to His voice is to acknowledge that the path that He calls us to walk may not always align with the world's definition of success, safety or logic, it means that His kingdom operates according to values that are often the reverse of those we see around us.

In the New Testament we see this clearly in the life of Jesus. He preached a message of love, sacrifice and humility that was utterly contrary to the expectations of the religious elite and the political powers of His day.

He taught that the first would be last, that the greatest would be servants and that to find life, one must first lose it.

His life was a living paradox, turning upside down everything the world considered wise and good, and in the cross, the ultimate foolishness of the world, the death of a King. God revealed His wisdom for it was through the crucifixion that salvation came to humanity.

This divine wisdom that defies human understanding continues to speak today. When God asks us to forgive the unforgivable, to love the unlovable or to give when we have little to give, it will often feel uncomfortable, irrational and counterproductive, yet it is in these moments that we discover that God's voice is not leading us into confusion but into deeper communion with His divine purpose.

We are being invited to trust a wisdom that surpasses our own, to follow a path that leads not to temporal success but to eternal glory. The voice of God calls us to live according to His wisdom, not the wisdom of the world and it is there in the surrender of our limited understanding that we find the fullness of His truth.

As we reflect on the powerful truth that God speaks to us in every moment of our lives, it becomes clear the invitation He extends is not merely to hear but to listen with hearts that are ready to be transformed.

Through the noise of our daily existence, His voice calls out, often quietly, sometimes in ways we don't expect, inviting us to step into deeper trust, surrender and transformation.

When we silence the distractions and open ourselves to His timing, we realize that God's message is never random but always timely, always relevant, always for our good. Listening to God's voice requires a radical surrender of our own will and wisdom.

It asks us to trust when we don't understand, to follow when the path seems unclear and to obey when the world tells us to go another way, but in this act of surrender, we find life, life in its fullness, life that comes not from our own strength, but from the eternal wisdom of the One who speaks and as we obey we are transformed, we are no longer who we were but we are being shaped more into the image of Christ.

His voice calls us not to comfort but to change, not to complacency, but to action. It asks us to step out in faith, to live according to a wisdom that is not of this world and to trust that His ways, though they often defy human logic, are always good, always for our good, and always leading us to a place of greater intimacy with Him.

As we listen, we discover that the voice of God is not distant, it is present, intimate and transformative.

Thank you for allowing me to speak this life changing message with you today. I pray that each of you would hear the voice of God in your lives, that you would have ears to listen, hearts to obey and the courage to follow where He leads. May His voice guide into the abundant life He has promised. God bless you all.
